Extract from Harry Truman's letter to Eleanor Roosevelt (elected representative of the USA to the United Nations), 1945

You, as a representative of the United States, will bear the grave responsibility of demonstrating the wholehearted support which this Government is pledged to give to the United Nations organization, to the end that the organization can become the means of preserving international peace and of creating conditions of mutual trust and economic and social well-being among all peoples of the world. I am confident that you will do your best to assist the United States to accomplish these purposes in the first meeting of the General Assembly.

Sincerely yours,
Harry Truman

Extract from Ian Kershaw, On Hitler's Place in History: The Lecture Podcast, 30 August 2019

How then should we look upon Hitler's place in history? Primarily, as the inspiration of the most lethal and destructive war in history, and of the most terrible genocide the world has ever seen. That's what, with the passage of time, we can see was historically defining about Hitler. Never before Hitler's time had we seen so clearly what human beings are capable of.

Secondly, we do have to acknowledge that he was an extraordinary individual, however repulsive. Every now and then through the ages, history has produced a remarkable individual – someone who shapes his era and leaves behind a drastically altered society.

But, thirdly, we shouldn't mystify Hitler's personality. The uniqueness of Nazism can't be reduced to that strange personality. Another time, another place, and Hitler would have had no impact at all. He couldn't have derailed a modern society without that society itself making a major contribution to its own fate. What we can see is how special the conditions had to be to give Hitler his appeal, to make him the spokesman and representative for such widespread hopes and expectations, as well as fears and anxieties. At a time of comprehensive crisis of state and society, Hitler seemed to offer so many the hope of national salvation.

Extract from a leading Nazi official’s book, 1938

The party had the duty to set high aims for the national work of the people – the aims that were born of the national socialist point of view. It has to bring public life into tune with these aims and to keep it there ... You only have to remember that leading posts in the state are filled by leading national socialists.
